The Quran in Arabic.JOURNAL of the RAND Corporation Volume 21, Number 4, July 1998 A cautionary tale about health and the Internet In March, I wrote a post about several typical anti-science groups which I called the anti-science movement. This month I want to follow up on my last remark about the Internet, which I considered to be quite positive. My thinking was that it does seem like the Internet facilitates more rapid, widespread propaganda, like that depicted in this film about "Vaccinations: Should You Be Afraid?". But this is just not how the Internet works. Essentially, the Internet tends to amplify free speech by providing unfettered access to a broad array of information, even when it conflicts with other important societal values. Now, of course, the Internet is not the only place where people get good information about health, and the community of journalists and researchers do a pretty good job of identifying the important and correct information (although I would note that correct information is not always understood or accepted by the mainstream media). But I think that in terms of information sources, the Internet is a force for good and one of the strengths of the Internet should be its ability to: 1) provide support for people to get information that they agree with, or that otherwise find useful. 2) to provide different perspectives so that it allows people to learn more about ideas and people whom they disagree with. 3) to provide a multi-channel network for distributing ideas and information. 4) to allow people to express

I have a toilet and sink in my bathroom and I am looking for a way to have an automatic shower and/or bath device. I tried searching online and in the few stores that I looked at (for an automatic shower etc) the prices were really high and the quality of the devices were not the greatest. I would be happy to share a link to a page with a list of companies/products that can do the job, or if anyone here has personal experience and can share how they did it I would appreciate it. A: I had to do this a year or so ago. I ended up building my own, part of which was to replace the normal shower head with a rain shower head. I used a combo faucet and shower head. I installed plastic piping that would go into the wall to the back wall of the shower. I then turned the faucet on and off to adjust the flow of the water. This allowed for a low flow to give good pressure, and a high flow to give the water volume. You can adjust this manually, but it's easier to just turn the faucet on and off. I then went to the hardware store and picked up a garden hose about 3/4" in diameter. Cut it open, slipped it over a garden hose connector. I then got a french drain. I wrapped an old shower curtain around the pipe and taped it to the wall. That water then flushed into the shower/bathtub. I then slicked the front of the shower curtain with hot water, so that the water that came in from the shower would also run into the
