This may partly be seen as a kind of "naked aestheticism" which did not exist in "socialist realism", but which (at least in a more or less significant part of Sorokin's work) was implicit in it and therefore was all the more in demand. To illustrate this state of affairs, here are just a few examples. In his poem "Letter from the Village" (1983; published in 1990) Sorokin, referring to the fact that "in Soviet times" "everything in the village was painted...", adds: "that was the main problem." And in his 1981 poem "But

This Is Only the Beginning" he writes: "Yes, even now, just as before, everything is painted out. In another of his works, "The Land of Le. In the work of the Sorokins, the theme of the village is of great importance. It is linked to the theme of the land, in which it becomes key. If we talk about the village in the works of Tvardovsky, it appears as a kind of closed world, which is opposed to the city. If we talk about the village in the work of the Sorokins, it is presented as an isolated and closed unit, existing under its own laws. In the poem "The Last Judgment" (1961) Sorokin writes: In the city, everything is not so: There is none of that silence, There is none of that silence That nature had. In souls and in heads. In people's minds and minds of vanity. There's no hiding There's nowhere to go There's no hiding. Chorus: We may not have enough space, And we're not strong enough to wander, Without wings we can't soar The earth won't let us rise... We can't see the sun, we can't see the stars â<sup>TMa</sup> We're in a net, we're in a net â<sup>TMa</sup> # And there's no way out In the city all is not so: There's no silence, The silence that nature had. In the souls and in the heads In people's minds and in people's minds There's nowhere to go
