Cloning and sequence of genomic and complementary DNA (cDNA) clones for the alpha A crystallin. We isolated, cloned, and sequenced a human cDNA probe for the alpha A crystallin using the lambda ZAP II expression vector. The probe was isolated from a human lens cDNA library by immunoscreening with anti-alpha A antibody. This cDNA probe was used to screen additional human cDNA libraries constructed from cultured cell lines, fetal cDNA libraries, and a lambda ZAP II expression library. We obtained multiple cDNA clones that represent different subclasses of alpha A crystallin mRNAs from these libraries. We sequenced these clones and found that four of the clones have the same cDNA sequence, but one of the clones has a different cDNA sequence. In contrast to the high degree of sequence homology between the clones, the sequence of each genomic clone is very similar to the sequence of its cDNA clone. We also isolated genomic clones corresponding to the three classes of alpha A crystallin mRNAs identified by gel electrophoresis, and we sequenced these clones. The genomic clones correspond to the mRNAs transcribed from alpha A genes which have been tandemly arrayed on a single chromosome. These data establish that the human alpha A crystallin consists of only three different polypeptide chains: those encoded by the three classes of mRNAs, and
