Evaluation of new ELISA reagents for the detection of henipaviruses. Henipaviruses are zoonotic, RNA viruses (genus Nipahvirus, family Paramyxoviridae) that are transmitted to humans through exposure to infected animals. An influenza-like illness, with severe pulmonary pathology and encephalitis, has been reported in humans. The high case fatality rate makes it imperative that diagnosis is carried out quickly and sensitively in order to facilitate epidemiological investigations and implement infection control measures. Nucleic acid amplification tests have been widely used for diagnosis, but new, inexpensive, and rapid tests that can be implemented easily in the field are required. We evaluated the performances of new ELISAs to detect henipaviruses. This evaluation was based on two monoclonal antibodies, prepared from mice immunized with virus-like particles of Hendra virus and Nipah virus respectively, and also on a polyclonal antiserum, prepared from horses exposed to Nipah virus. The sensitivity of the ELISAs was similar to that of the nucle
