More particularly, it relates to such apparatus which is capable of simultaneously twisting a number of spaced yarn ends and which utilizes a plurality of support members adapted to provide a twisting force to a plurality of yarn ends to simultaneously produce a twined product. In the production of twined yarns, it is conventional to utilize yarn guide apparatus having a plurality of spools supporting the yarn end to be twined. In most production processes, the guide apparatus is associated with a twisting mechanism which is adapted to twist the yarn ends to provide a twined yarn product having the requisite strength for the particular application. In production processes, the yarn ends are typically twisted in single or multiple planes to provide the various desired constructions and/or pile configurations. Typically, the yarn ends are simultaneously twined with a twisting action which commonly utilizes a generally cylindrical tube defined by opposed jaws having opposed teeth, wherein the direction of rotation of the tube is defined by rotation of the pair of jaws around an axis of rotation. A plurality of yarn ends are supported within the tube and are simultaneously twisted around the axis of the tube with the tube being maintained in a twisted condition to produce a twined yarn product. In order to protect the yarns from damage, it is desirable to support the yarn ends in an envelope having a plurality of apertures defined therein. The apertures are sized to permit the passage of the yarn end through the support while restricting the escape of the yarn end from the tube. The apertures are disposed in fixed spacing relationship which permits the apertures to align with the openings in the jaws of the twisting mechanism to permit a yarn end to pass from one jaw to the other. Thus, the apertures in the envelope are shaped to facilitate passage of the yarn end from one jaw to the other with the jaw teeth remaining intact. The tubes of the yarn guide apparatus typically include a number of apertures which are spaced angularly around the tube. The apertures may extend through the tube entirely to permit the passage of yarn ends therethrough or they may be disposed near the edge of the tube, extending at an angle therefrom to permit the yarn ends to pass in an arc through
