Cycle shortage for the Bay Area A new study released today finds that Bay Area residents are facing a projected shortage of 20,000 bike parking spaces. The problem is not just that our cities have not been able to create more bike parking spots fast enough — especially with the increase in cargo bikes — but the demand for places to lock them up has increased. The problem of a cycling shortage is more than a cycle policy issue. It's a transportation policy issue. The capital infusions Bay Area cities spend on improving their bike infrastructure is a necessary but limited tool in addressing the transportation problem. That infusions is good policy for all modes, including but not limited to cycling. The bike infrastructure improvements the region is investing in are the foundational pieces of the city-built transportation network. So it should not be a surprise that they also reduce car traffic, improve people's safety, give people a reason to ride more, and even help get to work. But if we are trying to create more cycle space, the city should not overlook the impact that has on other modes, especially on people walking, where access to urban bike lanes can threaten the pedestrian realm. One of the findings of the new report is that after the Marin County Bicycle Plan and the urban bike plan for San Francisco, the data shows that overall, the region saw an increase in the number of miles ridden, but very little increase in the number of trips taken in a typical weekday. So where are all these cyclists going? The answer is, not where the bike plan wants them to go. The greatest share of bike commuters are going to the suburbs. The counties that have the best bike infrastructures — Marin, Sonoma, and Napa — all have more bike trips per capita than San Francisco. And that's in large part because the commute pattern of the suburbs is more conducive to bike commuting than that of the city. Cycling infrastructure is not just infrastructure
