A conventional CMP

machine is depicted in FIG. 1. A wafer polish pad 103 is affixed to a platen 105. A carrier arm 107 is used to pick up a wafer 109 from a cassette and place it on the wafer polish pad 103. The wafer polish pad 103 has a diameter that is somewhat larger than the diameter of the wafer. With this geometry, the wafer polish pad 103 contacts the entire surface of the wafer 109. As the wafer 109 rotates on the wafer polish pad 103, the pad and wafer 109 achieve a more-or-less simultaneous rotation, as shown by arrows 111 and 113. As the wafer 109 rotates, the wafer 109 is pressed against a resilient polishing belt 101 while a rotating polishing head 109a impinges on and presses against the wafer 109. The polishing belt 101 and polishing head 109a are typically made from polyurethane. The rotating polishing head 109a is the only moving part of the CMP machine. Both the polishing belt 101 and the polishing head 109a are typically connected to a motor 103b. Typically, one motor 103b and the polishing belt 101 and the polishing head 109a are driven by a polishing pad 103c. The polishing pad 103c is typically fabricated from a hard and rigid plastic, such as polyurethane or polyethylene. In fact, the polishing pad 103c is typically a "fixed-abrasive polishing pad", which is attached to a resilient polishing platen 105. The polishing pad 103c is typically formed of individual fixed abrasive particles bonded into an elastomer
