Levels. The Levels dialog box (Window>Levels) contains nine drop-down menu controls, one for each color channel: red, blue, green, cyan, magenta, yellow, black, white, and grayscale. These controls allow you to adjust the relative lightness and darkness of colors in images. A common use for Levels is to adjust the overall brightness or contrast of a color image. This is done by adjusting the brightness levels of each color channel individually. When adjusting colors, I usually use the green, yellow, and red colors channels first. When editing color images, the goal is to compensate for over-saturated colors, such as orange or red. When adjusting color, first adjust the green and yellow levels and then adjust the red to compensate. Darkening levels reduces the overall lightness of a color and fades out colors. In contrast, brightening levels increases the overall lightness of a color and increases colors. Levels can also be used to correct color shifts caused by lighting differences, by adjusting the contrast of a color image. Curves. Adjusting the brightness, contrast, and color of an image with the Levels dialog box can be a difficult task. To achieve your artistic goals, it's much easier to use the Curves dialog box (Window>Curves) to fine-tune an image. In contrast to Levels, which is level-based, Curves allows for a broader range of color balance, and it has a much more artistic approach. The Curves dialog box gives you nine sliders that control the brightness, contrast, and color of a color image. You can manipulate any color channel as well as adjust the black point (the minimum lightness of a color), the white point (the maximum lightness of a color), and the hue (the color). You can also fine-tune the colors of a grayscale image by using the Curves to adjust the curve of a grayscale image. The curve in grayscale images is used as a reference for the black and white point. See Figure 7-6, image B, for an example of using the Curves dialog box. Figure 7-6. To fine-tune the brightness, contrast, and color of a color image, open the Curves dialog box (Window>Curves) and adjust the brightness, contrast, and color of an image using the

Q: Is it safe to use absolute paths for database connection strings? I've read somewhere (can't find it now) that it's a bad idea to use absolute paths in connection strings. I guess it's bad because they don't make the "physical" connection string visible. Is that true? Is it safe to use absolute paths and still be secure? For example I've come up with "ConnectionString" = "Data Source=D:\MyFiles\MyDatabase.mdf;Integrated Security=True". Is it safe? A: If you always deploy your database with your application, it's definitely a good idea to use relative paths. However, I would generally set the connection string on the app.config of your application and then run "appname.exe.config /? connectionString" to show which connectionString value is used at runtime. A: When someone is in a wild mood, the only thing they'd usually do is to replace the "\", ":", and "." characters in your path with '/', or possibly with backslashes. So the proper version of the example you posted would be: ConnectionString = "Data Source=D:/MyFiles/MyDatabase.mdf;Integrated Security=True"
Q: What is the sequence of decomposing a big search space (using DFS) in SPOCC? I use DFS to decompose a big search space, and I have observed that the search process can be divided into three stages: 1) BFS if the number of nodes in the tree is not more than a given number, and the distance of the current state from the root node (or the current state itself) is less than a given number. 2) DFS if the number of nodes in the tree is more than a given number. 3) BFS if the distance of the current state from the root node (or the current state itself) is more than a given number. From the above, I can deduce that the time complexity of searching a big search space (with DFS) will be divided into three parts: BFS: $O(n)$ (n is the number of nodes in the tree, according to big-O) DFS: $O(m)$ BFS: $O(1)$ Where n can be larger than
