Qualcomm Semiconductor has created a chip capable of predicting a phone's mood and materializing the appropriate sounds Qualcomm says its new sensors built into mobile phones allow them to detect how a person is feeling, and even the kind of song they prefer to listen to. It's thinking of new ways to alert a call recipient about how they're doing, and notify others of changes in moods. No, you're not hallucinating, but actually physically feeling differently. The technology can detect whether a person is feeling sad, tired, happy or excited, and you're not just talking about emotions of the moment; these changing emotions can even change for the better, as when the weather improves, or when one has a new breakthrough. One day you'll talk into your phone and others will be able to predict what mood you're in. Using a typical mobile phone with embedded sensors and a Qualcomm Tricorder Xpress that comprises an antenna, battery, data connection, a low-power processor, and wireless communication, the device enables a user to take a quick blood, glucose, and temperature reading — all while performing diagnoses on how users are feeling. With a tiny 3.8 x 1.9 x 0.7 inches (or 24 x 16 x 17.8 mm) mobile mini-tricorder device, you can take this technology, which uses the latest microelectromechanical systems (MEMS) to reliably detect and monitor a person's biometrics, and literally build it
