I'm not sure if this is an issue specific to VS2013 (as my dev team is using 2008), or a deeper misconfiguration in my environment. I don't have my own machine with VS2013 installed; this is a build server. But I have a Web Application Project, with an asp.net page-based layout, set as my start up project, containing several stylesheets, images, javascripts, and css. The start-up file contains all the assets, and in the web.config file, I have the setting enabled. The problem is: I can add a new blank page to the website, and Visual Studio will add everything without a hitch, and the resulting html is clean, simple, and the most basic I've ever seen. But when I drag an already existing.aspx file to the "New Item" dialog, and attempt to compile it, I see this error: ASP.NET: The page was not found. You have requested a page ("") that does not exist. I've searched for a solution for a few hours and have come up with nothing. I thought that maybe it was looking in the wrong location, but I've been trying all the files that I know about, like the built-in debug and release, bin, obj folders, and the Web application root, and nothing has worked. I've even tried it in IIS, and that seems to be working. Is there something I'm overlooking? A: It turns out that I somehow had the VB project selected in the File System view,
