QtColorPicker is a very simple to use software that can assist users in making conversions between various color models. The application integrates with the Windows Clipboard and allows users to transfer information to any other programs, including text editors. A good tool for converting between color models Anyone who regularly works with color hues will find this simple converter highly valuable. Users that regularly handle graphical editing and processing might also draw value from it. One can also employ it as a valuable educational tool (e.g. as a color teacher for children). The tool features a very simple interface that is geared towards efficiency and ease of use (only one window handles all the program's functions). Several buttons correspond to the main color models present and three color frames control hue, saturation and color values. Supports HSV, RGB, CMYK and HEX QtColorPicker is very simple to use: in order to obtain relevant information, one must simply select the desired color, and adjust the hue and saturation values. As users move the pointer around, codes are automatically updated in several fields that correspond to the supported color models. The utility supports the three major models - HSV, RGB and CMYK. Two other options, "HEX" and "HEX #", exist and one of the great features of this application is that it allows users to input custom codes. This is, in effect, going about it the other way around, in the sense that instead of selecting a color, one can insert a code and get the hue. Integrates with the Clipboard All the information can be transferred to the Windows Clipboard, which is a great option for quickly copy-pasting codes to different applications. All things considered, QtColorPicker is a simple and practical resource for anyone who needs quick conversion between various common color models.
