Go to Google Play or iTunesQ: Functional programming in Clojure - how to access a set of instructions from different threads without knowing the number In a recent interview I had the following question. In clojure, what would be a strategy to access the instructions in an assembly instruction set which are not addressable? I thought a thread-safe way to go about it is to use a map but I am not very sure if this is the appropriate way to do it in clojure. I wonder if there is any clever way to do this using a map or some other efficient data structure. EDIT: I am aware of the fact that this would not be practical on the JVM. But since the code is not being executed, my question is how would one go about such a scenario when the CPU is in one core. A: The code is being executed. If you are talking about a situation where a core has to read from a location that hasn't been assigned to it yet, then that would be a programming error. So just make sure the thread is holding a reference to the map when it needs to pull the information. Q: Why is the cost of adding a node to a linked list greater than adding a node to an array? I have come across an interesting comparison between an array and a linked list. I would like to ask that if anyone knows why is it that an array can be extended by simply adding an additional node whereas a linked list requires you to do some more operations? A: Because in an array, the new node is always the same size, so we don't have to go to special casing, etc. In a linked list, you may have to rewrite elements to the left of the new node, and possibly rewrite elements at the end of the list. Q: Animation from a table view to another I am trying to implement the following animation: I have a table view at the top of the main view and then a collection view below
