What's New In Explorer8?

Explorer8 is a new Windows Explorer replacement that's designed to look beautiful on touch devices by leveraging Windows 8's new Modern UI. Struvite lithiasis of parathyroid tissue and bony metastatic calcifications of the maxilla in a patient with multiple myeloma. The authors report a case of a patient with multiple myeloma with unusual clinical and histopathologic features of parathyroid neoplasia. The patient presented with a solitary 1.5-cm nodular parathyroid adenoma located at the lower pole of the left thyroid lobe, which was removed. Histopathology revealed the presence of pure amyloid deposits in the parathyroid tissue. Serum calcium was suppressed after the surgery. Five months later, the patient developed markedly symptomatic bone lesions in the maxilla, which were histopathologically shown to be bony metastatic calcifications and, therefore, thought to be due to hypercalcemia from multiple myeloma. The ecological nature of commercial livestock production has led to the observation that, because of resource competition, feed cost is an important constraint in the economical feasibility of livestock production. Historically, in the state of Texas, corn was the animal feed of choice, and while this has changed over the years, corn still remains the predominant animal feed in Texas. Another major cost factor in animal agriculture is the cost of seed corn. It has been estimated that the annual cost of conventional corn (bred to be a specialty crop) is $100 to $200 per acre. In an effort to reduce animal feed cost, a number of techniques are now being evaluated to reduce the need to grow corn. The use of forage legumes such as alfalfa has been used. Very high forage yields have been obtained by the application of nitrogen fertilizer. Weed control has been improved by the use of herbicides. In addition, hybrid varieties of corn have been developed which have greatly increased grain yields. While each of these approaches reduces the cost of corn consumed by animals, the principal problem faced in all of the techniques being applied is the limitation of the increase in grain yields to practical application to a limited extent of the corn producing land. For example, with the use of nitrogen fertilizer, the increase in grain yield has been measured to be only 15%. The use of herbicides has reduced the production of undesirable weeds by 80%, but some undesirable weeds still remain in the fields. Further, the use of hybrid corn has increased the yield per plant by 20%. However,
