There are many ways of driving motors such as two-way race cars, and chassis-level drives etc. All these drives require to be supplied with power via an electrical cable, which has several disadvantages when used in mass-produced models. The manufacturing and assembly process for such models is highly labor intensive and involves a large number of different component parts. This results in higher component costs and a larger number of parts to be manufactured. Even when using state of the art techniques, there is still a risk of parts breaking, which can result in incorrect and dangerous driving conditions. Therefore, there is an eager demand for an electric driving system for a two-way race car which overcomes the above-mentioned disadvantages and still allows the use of the same components, preferably the same motor, when manufacturing two-way race cars in large amounts.
