A: This is not easy as it has a few localizations (formats). Fortunately we can handle this and it will only take a couple of hours if we divide up the work. Given the input string I would use 2 different regular expressions, one for the title of the karangan and the one for the total of the karangan. I would also store the karangan and titles in a dictionary (or other mapping container), so that you can retrieve each combination. You should also consider splitting each string by the commas and no commas so you can add in a space separator later, and add a line feed (LF) character () to the string before storing it in a database or something. Add in error checking - if the item is not found in the dictionary, then add an entry with the title of the karangan and nothing (or 0). Likewise if you have a title without any corresponding karangan then you will have an entry for that (and you can add the error into the dictionary). Of course each of those are easy to do. By the way, I would prefer to read from a CSV file as it is easy to do and is pretty standard. A datetime column will help as well, but the user has to have timezone information for that (plus maybe they have time for their local time zone) to be useful.
