ol, and therefore could be anticipated by clinicians. Other factors, including patient preference and local conditions, may also determine the choice of ASCT partner. We attempted to quantify the clinical relevance of the CXCL12/CXCR4 chemoattractant pathway by measuring the MDS after ASCT using CXCL12 as a single and combined predictor of OS. Of note, in the multivariate model, both mononuclear and bi-nucleated MDS were associated with a worse outcome, and likely included CXCR4-positive mononuclear cells (i.e. those of monocyte-macrophage lineage). Therefore, by modeling MDS as mononuclear cells, the effect of the intrinsic heterogeneity of MDS subpopulations might have been underestimated. CXCR4 is a G-protein coupled receptor and is expressed on the surface of hematopoietic cells and certain cancer cells including AML cells [15,16]. Evidence suggests that CXCR4 is an important mediator of MDS migration [15]. In our cohort, we found that high CXCL12 and high CXCR4 levels in the BM were associated with shorter OS. This was confirmed in the multivariate model: CXCL12 and CXCR4 remained significant independent predictors of OS. When the two predictors were combined, the analysis was no longer statistically significant, even in the univariate model. However, when we introduced the more specific ASCT partners (i.e. NCC-Yas, CD34+ HSCs and pDP) as independent variables in a multivariate model with CXCL12 and CXCR4 levels, they were still significant (and independently predictive) for the combined outcome of OS, even though with lower p-values. The above data, in conjunction with the data from our previous study [10], indicate that the CXCL12/CXCR4 chemoattractant axis, which functions by recruiting a CXCR4-positive subpopulation of mononuclear cells to the BM, should be recognized as an important predictor of AML outcome. The CXCL12/CXCR4 axis may therefore be considered a general AML chem

What's New in the Adobe Photoshop 2021?

After Suu Kyi's victory last week, the Myanmar democracy icon told The Hindu on Wednesday that her family had already put their Bagan bungalow up for sale. Indeed, images of the family's real estate property in the British colonial grandeur of Inwa, located just north of Yangon, are likely to be splashed across front pages in India. But the irony of the nettlesome Burmese political refugee also coming to India, like a free-spirited butterfly, is that she has not stopped fretting over the fate of her homeland since her first visit here in 2012. Selling off a property she still owns is one way to concentrate on the country she wants to return to. "My sons and I, now that we've been back in Myanmar for nearly seven years, do miss the Burmese countryside, but we are waiting for the right time to sell my Bagan property. We would like to stay permanently in Myanmar, but we will sell it as soon as we get a good offer," Dr Myint Oo Suu Kyi, a former doctor turned activist, said. "My sons are doing their best to make me feel at home here. Unlike in the United States, where I am free to work, here they have to look after me," the 76-year-old Nobel laureate added. "My generation grew up in a civil war, and we have had our fill of violence. I worry about the future for the kids (my grandchildren) because they have to live in a country like this." The former political prisoner, still hugely popular across the region for her role in the democracy struggle, was in the news for the sake of breaking the inhumane bonds forced on her and other political prisoners by the junta. After winning her freedom last week and driving to the airport under heavy security, Dr Suu Kyi changed her mind and was taken to her secret prison again, this time at the hands of the National League for Democracy (NLD), which leads the current democratic government in Myanmar. "Those who claim that I was kidnapped are saying things that are not true. If I had been kidnapped, they would have had to explain why. I was at the airport about to board a plane when I was brought back to prison. All the security I saw at the airport is for the NLD," she said. However,
