The distance is calculated as current_value + new_value, which is the distance from last_value to current_value, then multiplying this by the factor. I have been told that this isn't the optimal way of doing things and this may impact future stability. However, how would I determine the value of distance by looking at last_value, and multiplying by the factor, without calculating current_value + new_value? If I was doing a simple subtraction of current_value from last_value, that would only work when current_value - last_value > 0 (because subtracting a negative value would result in a negative result), which wouldn't be true in some cases, and I would need to check that current_value was less than or equal to last_value. A: The optimisation in your example can be done by: determining the difference between the two values comparing the difference to a threshold There are many different threshold values that you can choose, here's one example: SELECT DISTINCT vals, CASE WHEN vals
