The present invention relates to a method and apparatus for a continuous slab casting, and more particularly to a method for casting long, thick slabs which are to be cut into slabs of smaller length and thickness and which are cast in a continuous manner. The invention resides in a method for casting a slab by feeding a slab of rolled material to a stationary top surface of a moving mold, dispensing molten metal from a nozzle into said stationary mold in an area above said top surface thereof, causing the top surface of the mold to lift to a position above the liquid level of the molten metal, and pressing on said top surface of said mold to form a slab of molten metal thereon so that the molten metal is confined between said mold and the top surface of said slab, and thereby causes the slab to solidify and solidify in thickness as it descends below a lower edge of the top surface of the mold. There are several known methods of continuous casting thick slabs of metal, e.g., steel or cast iron. Many of these methods employ the use of two or more mold portions moveable relative to each other or between a mold and a continuous roller conveyor, such as disclosed in U.S. Pat. Nos. 3,648,356, 3,571,987, 3,845,849, 3,993,002, 4,005,065, 4,057,292, 4,177,058, 4,281,959,

4,366,873, 4,443,336, 4,550,721, 4,566,502, and 4,579,772. These patents teach various methods, for example, of forming two or more cooperating mold portions moveable laterally for receiving and forming a slab into which molten metal is fed from a continuous supply source and of moving the mold and the continuous supply source relative to each other to enable a continuous casting operation. The prior art, however, has had certain drawbacks in that the prior art methods of continuous slab casting involve rather complicated moving and adjustable parts which are required in the mold. In particular, it has been difficult to produce slabs having a smooth continuous surface. Also, the size of the mold has been limited. This is due to the difficulty of forming openings of sufficient size between mold portions to allow the casting of molten material into the mold. There is need, therefore, for a new and improved method of continuous slab casting which overcomes the limitations of the prior art

One to Watch: Is Crowdfunding the future of American Manufacturing? By Christina Von H. on Friday, March 10th, 2012 Crowdfunding for American Manufacturing When you hear the word “manufacturing” all you think of is big factories and lots of chemicals pouring out and making a mess somewhere. You probably don't think about the people who make your products or the high-speed computer technology that drives your iPod or DVD player. But there are jobs in this industry and most of them are in the United States. Crowdfunding now provides an alternative for large capital intensive projects like solar panel farms, wind farms, and steel mills. So how does the concept of crowd funding work? Crowd funding is a process that allows your customers or other contributors to invest in a project on their own terms. This frees you from having to raise capital up front. Instead, contributors invest their money when you complete the project. In return, you pay them back a pre-determined percentage plus interest. For some projects, this simply means more funds will be available to complete the project. In others, it can help you attract additional investors so you can get the project underway sooner. The biggest advantage to crowd funding is the ease with which it allows people to donate. Crowd funding lets contributors invest in products or projects through websites like Kickstarter. Many of these websites let you pledge as little as $1 to see if others will match the pledge. For an example of a very successful crowd funding campaign, watch the video below and then keep reading. A crowdfunding campaign known as “crowd funder” has the potential to revolutionize small businesses, especially startups. Crowd funder, a popular crowdfunding website, is now raising money to fund the world’s first indoor free-flying aircraft. The student-built, wire-less, six-passenger device, called the FlyJoy, has been designed to be built for 10 dollars or less by anyone with a decent set of tools. The kit includes everything needed to build a model aircraft, except a pilot. Paul E. MacClintock, CEO of Crowdfunder said, “The challenge in this little project is to provide an affordable kit that can be put together by a hobbyist with some experience in shop work and a passion for aviation.” The FlyJoy plane can be built in about a half an hour and
