The present invention relates to apparatus for measuring magnetic flux density  $B$  and more particularly, to a fault-tolerant apparatus for directly measuring  $B$  and providing an indication of probable fault locations when the apparatus measures a low magnetic flux density. Electrical devices, such as transformers, are commonly used in the electric power industry to provide isolation of electricity by absorbing unwanted electricity. In the power industry, it is common to operate on alternating current (AC) and frequency. Thus, a power transformer will take AC having a frequency of 50 or 60 Hz and create a single frequency of AC output with a frequency of 50 or 60 Hz. A power transformer is a transformer which has a primary winding to receive electricity and a secondary winding which generates electricity. Some transformers have both a primary and a secondary winding. Further, a power transformer is an electrical device which may vary from a few hundred to several thousand volts in potential. Voltage transformation occurs when electrical energy flows from an AC power source to one or more loads. Electrical currents at the secondary winding of a power transformer are proportional to the AC voltage applied to the secondary winding. The connection to the secondary winding is called the primary winding. Thus, if the voltage applied to the secondary winding is sinusoidal, then the current at the secondary winding is also sinusoidal. The primary winding is the connection to the AC power source. As such, a power transformer provides isolation and voltage transformation between the AC power source and one or more loads. Transformers are often used with alternating current power sources to provide isolation. However, a fault condition may occur in a power transformer due to wire breakage or a short circuit condition. When the wire breaks, the voltage at the secondary winding may increase due to a higher current flowing into the open circuit. The higher current generates heat which may destroy the transformer. Further, the increased current also generates an increase in magnetic flux to create a magnetic flux density which causes the voltage to increase. A high voltage may occur at the power transformer secondary winding if the voltage is greater than the permissible voltage of the transformer. The high voltage may burn the components of the transformer. Additionally, if a short circuit occurs, the power transformer secondary winding may be completely or nearly completely shorted to the power transformer primary winding. The short circuit may destroy the voltage transformer which could potentially

Ask HN: Average Time from Paid to Dedicated Server in US? - Corrado I'm based in Italy and I'm considering moving to the US for a longer period of time. I need to know the typical time from the moment I get a paid job in IT, to the moment I'm in a dedicated server. In Italy the time is about 3 months, but I have a few questions about the US. I'm mainly asking about the timing, but I'd also be happy if someone had a general summary of the process and the rules. ===== pjc50 The process starts with a government application, not all of which get through (and the application form itself takes time, both to complete and to get a timely response) and then sometime before you get a job there's an interview where they'll ask you a large number of questions and give you a test that you have to pass to get a US Work Visa. Then there's usually a six-month, then a three-month, then the visa itself, then an employer-submitted Green Card and possibly more interviews. Finally (may be ongoing) there's a PRS interview. In the US time is money and the immigration process is long because the process has to be managed. Expect to be waiting about 12 months to find a vacancy and another 6-12 to get a Green Card. ----- joe_the_user As a resident alien, immigration to the US is a scary mess. When I last visited, there were some ten thousand applications for the green card backlog. If you are a skilled worker, your chances of getting a Green Card will likely be very high. If you are depend on family for sponsorship, you'll have
