AutoCAD History Computer-aided design (CAD) software, initially used by only the most technically advanced and most budget-conscious construction companies, began to become available for personal computer use in the 1980s. The first CAD programs were used by several architects and construction professionals, including University of Oregon professor Michael Graves, who began working with a software program in 1977 and would go on to play a role in the creation of Autodesk. In the early 1980s, Professor Graves used a program created by software developer David Pitzoni, then called the Painted Square. According to Graves, the program was designed to help Pitzoni model, work out, and cost his remodeling job at the University of Oregon. The resulting program was first distributed on microcomputers in December 1982, as the first commercial desktop CAD program. Autodesk, which originally was a small design consulting company based out of Eugene, Oregon, produced and released the first version of AutoCAD for the Apple II microcomputer, an internal graphics controller designed to create 2D drawings. Although the original Autodesk development tools ran on an Apple II, they could also be used on less sophisticated graphics systems. The company's first release of AutoCAD was based on the Apple II, which ran on an internal graphics controller. Apple II graphics cards (also called Video Interface Controllers, or VICs) were low-cost components that interfaced between the computer's internal bus and the Apple II's video output. Originally, the Apple II graphics card was designed to draw graphics for the Apple II's built-in "TV-out" display (sometimes called a "memory-mapped" display). These
