Why you need to own a wood-burning stove or fireplace? We're wood-fire people, so don't get us wrong, we're not bashing non-wood-burning stoves. We just really like ours. They are different than a conventional stove, with some interesting advantages and characteristics. True wood-fire stoves are the original chimenea stoves. They were built and used in Europe for centuries as well as the Pacific Islands before the West arrived. It makes sense – the long, slow burn of logs, coupled with an open hearth with the chimney to the outside, provides a great cook experience. Not to mention, it makes the fireplaces of your house more welcoming for guests. But how well do these wood-fire stoves stand the test of time? We had the opportunity to test out two different types of stoves to see how they compare with each other. Wood-burning chimeneas Wood-burning chimeneas are the original wood-burning stoves. They are built as large chimney stoves with a firebox or hearth for cooking. To keep the fire contained, we have two of them in our kitchen and living room (see photo above). We've had ours for about 15 years now, and they have aged gracefully. They can still handle the heat of the fire at the same time as maintaining a steady temperature in the kitchen. We have roasted corn on the cob and prepared goat cheese lasagna over these fires. Of course the biggest advantage of a chimenea is that there is no separate burner, the flame is fueled directly by the wood. The nice thing is, you can put anything in the firebox and it'll burn, so you can prepare a variety of foods using a chimenea stove. We have made usadari, a Middle Eastern spice cake. The chimenea stoves we have have the sweet wood flavor of a baking fire as well, but there is a bit of wet smoke smell from the burning wood. The gas cooktops are nice, but 0cc13bf012

But rather than solely a quantitative focus on 'how much better is this?', it needed to actually ask the question: 'what if the world no longer has a scientific or technological imperative?' What if we just don't have a need to improve the science or technology as we have known it? What if the science and technology ceases to be a competitive imperative, but instead becomes something we engage with as we choose who we are and what we do as a social group? I spent my 50th birthday reflecting on how we might end up where we are today with robot ethics and with this premise, that we might not need to meet the demands of the existing science and technology imperative. By turning things around, by asking a different question, the rest of the story is quite interesting in its own right. Perhaps at some point in the future, we might begin to view the robot science and technology of the future as that which we choose to engage with and learn from ourselves. In the late 20th Century, we all agreed that science was the great engine of progress and that the future would be brighter and more prosperous for our children and our children's children. Now, we have reason to question that premise. It will be interesting to see if we continue to see this as the great engine of progress, or if we begin to question the very premise itself. Perhaps we will agree that
