Oh and it also has RPG elements. In-game there is an RPG like action menu with the control of your allies. The story begins with you waking up on a pile of corpses, while your convoy is in some unknown disaster. You can choose your allies and allies can be customised on the left. With some abilities and some potions, weapons and more to earn and upgrade you can play as either an AI, or as the main hero (which you play as from the start) The basic plot is a story of a kid who has to survive in the middle of a cursed forest, with the help of a super truck, and his companions. Each level is a real life map, in a real life on the rails system. You start by choosing the level and your convoy and pass through the forest. As you pass every roadblock, you have to choose the truck from the many options you have available. The less trucks you use the better it is. All-in-all it should take you about 15 mins to beat the game. Bugs and crashes: When an event is triggered or the player is in the middle of a battle, when the game is over. The dog was replaced with a cat for some unclear reason. No more weapons for the AI, it sucks. A bug was removed from last update, with the consequence of the enemies acting strangely around a powerup. The location of the keys and the war room is slightly wrong, but it is hard to tell because the FPS changed a lot. A comment was added for a

What's new in Cursed Road Convoy:

The Cursed Road Convoy was an early armored convoy operation of the American General George S. Patton's Third Army in World War II. It was directed to support the armistice negotiations between his combat units and the German forces in northern Italy. In the context of the later Mediterranean Campaign it was an "Easter Parade", a similar O.S.S.-sponsored mission. Patton's forces took part in the operation on Easter Sunday in an attempt to secure the right to meet with the German divisions in the area as well as establish the highest possible authority during the truce, but the initiative was still under the control of Field Marshal Albert Kesselring and Oberst der Gebirgstruppe Franz Kurowski. According to a recently uncovered American Military Intelligence report, an estimated 300 German soldiers were killed by American artillery fire. Background Since 1943, the last of five major German offensives ("Operation Thunderclap") that began at the beginning of the year, cost the Germans some 60,000 casualties; the new offensive would cost the Germans further casualties. Operation Thunderclap was dealt a severe blow by General Patton's forces in the Battle of Caporetto, (21 November - 9 December) The early victories of American troops in Italy, however, had serious effects on German offensives elsewhere, boosting morale in the Eastern Front with Stalin ordering Alexander (Black Sea) and Montgomery to begin their massive offensives into the Caucasus. Army Group B, commanded by Field Marshal Model, was forced to also begin Operation Meusebusch to counter Western Allied advances in the east. Patton expected ample supplies and equipment to be transferred to the Greeks and Yugoslavians and decided that the German armor was irrelevant to a fast pace advance. He ordered a supply column to go into the area and meet with the German divisions on the border. First Army was to maintain control during this, and Patton was to free Eighth Army's supplies, and seize the right to meet with the German divisions. This was to be followed by a more detailed boundary agreement, the execution of which would be in the hands of Seventh Army commander General Truscott, along with Second Army and 1st Armored Division General Turner's Task Force B. Patton's plan, scheduled for 24 April, was significant, and depended entirely upon the cooperation of Austrian and German troops. He expected to have the desired supplies by 12 May, and Patton's forces to be free to move south into the line of the Bulgarian
