Elevators and Their Implications for Colonizing the Solar System elevators have been a recurring idea since the dawn of the Space Age, but they have never gone beyond the realm of science fiction. They are likely to be impossible according to the laws of physics, but I want to change all that. Specifically, in this entry I would like to address the possibility that space elevators are possible because of the rise of artificial intelligence (AI) and humanity's next big transition, to an Earth independent civilization. First, let me tell you what I am not talking about. Technically, I am talking about the possibility of a human made metallic or otherwise shaped construction being suspended beneath a tower, on which a "cablecar" can ascend. The cablecar would ascend by human supplied energy and the tower is something commonly referred to as “space elevator”. The idea of a space elevator has become somewhat popular because the Economist magazine (happily) picked up on it. Further, some think tank later hyped up the idea to seem more plausible than it really was, further exploring the idea for a book. All of which is history of the space elevator and its conceptual evolution. With this in mind, let us get to the point of this post. Artificial intelligence (AI) has returned to the popular layman’s mind due to Google’s recent initiative on AI, DeepMind and AlphaGo and Wolfram Alpha’s IPO. I suspect this is related to the idea of converging technologies that will have broader applications. Consider that many of the most powerful and fearsome weapons today, such as missiles, are supported by autonomous AI, which is, in many ways, a space elevator. Now let me show you what I mean. Space elevators, to be clear, do not work as they would in the clichéd sci-fi examples. Rather, they have to deal with several space related issues. For one, they have to deal with an extremely high launch speed at which all of the aforementioned media must flow in order to reach the return edge of the Earth’s orbit. Just the fact that it has to travel that speed! That means it must either come in from the direction of the sun, or according to the moon. Alternatively, it comes in the direction of Earth and gives it a nice little push. Also, due to friction, the cable (🔗
