The vast majority of the contention ratio is incurred at disk I/O time. We believe that simply by performing more non-disk I/O operations the contention ratio could be lowered. We have investigated the concurrency of disk operations at the level of the I/O stream. We have shown that the granularity of concurrency at the stream level gives some flexibility in handling related disk I/O operations. For example, by splitting the I/O stream into two parts, a partial and a full I/O stream and by partially overlapping the parts, it is possible to perform separate disk I/Os, and hence avoid the contention ratio on the data channel (as well as any potential idling time in idle segments). However, the downside of this approach is that there could be extra copies of the data, and overhead
