In the cerebral cortex of adult animals, glutamate (Glu) is the principle excitatory neurotransmitter. Studies of the function of the various subtypes of the Glu receptors in early developmental stage are of considerable interest, because it is not known whether the Glu excitatory responses observed in the adult are really functional. In the present study, the characteristics of the Glu receptors in the cerebral cortex of mice from the day of birth to 2 weeks old were examined by means of biochemical and pharmacological approaches. The Glu binding sites in the cerebral cortex of newborn mice were found to have the following characteristics: (1) saturable and reversible specific binding of Glu in cortical membrane preparations; (2) binding of glutamate was localized mostly in the forebrain membrane preparation; (3) binding affinity was saturable and was partially dependent on Mg²⁺ and Ca²⁺; (4) binding was significantly inhibited by alpha-methyl-DL-aspartate (alpha-MeAsp) but not by kainate and quisqualate; (5) there were nine different classes of binding sites with dissociation constants (KD) of 2.32, 7.61, 7.84, 9.18, 9.40, 15.53, 21.23, 27.18 and 45.38 nM, which were classified into the NMDA-2/glutamate receptors. The existence of NMDA receptors in newborn mice was further verified by the voltage-dependent and MK-801-sensitive inhibition of specific Glu binding. The KD values
