Such a structure for coupling a motor vehicle wheel and a hub body to each other is known in the art. For example, a ball detent is used as an element, in the two elements, of a ball detent coupling which has an elastic ring as a ball detent. The balls that are in the ball detent are pressed against a ring body provided on the ball detent by the pressure force. In addition, for the locking of the ball detent, an undercut ring profile is arranged on the ring body against which the ring profile, provided on the element, is clamped with a clamping wedge. In addition, DE 196 08 059 A1 describes a structure in which, for locking, a tapered recess is formed on the ring profile on the one hand and an external thread is provided on the clamping wedge on the other hand. In addition, a clamping force is exerted by the clamping wedge on the tapered recess and is generally predetermined. Finally, DE 10 2007 035 109 A1 describes a structure in which a ring-shaped bearing surface is provided on one of the two elements, a respective conical surface being formed opposite a flange provided on the other element, and a friction force being applied by a clamping device to one of the bearing surfaces and the flange in order to fix the two elements relative to each other. In addition, V. Caviglione et al. proposed, in a thesis work, for the coupling of a wheel and a hub body, a clamping ring
