Most recently, I published an article on Memory Leak Identification. I didn't find the article particularly interesting, which I'm sure was a mistake, but it was there if someone wanted to read about it. I came across the same problem again, and this time I've come up with a solution that would be useful to share, and that'll hopefully give some of you an idea of how one might go about identifying memory leaks using Eclipse and an appropriate plugin (or the Profiler plugin for Eclipse). Some of this may appear a little obvious to you (or you may already know this, and have some pointers for me), but I think it's also worth writing this down, as my thought is that if I get an idea of what other people think it'll be useful to have that information. So, there's this mysterious little thing that's eating up memory - how the heck do I identify it? Well, that's easy. The profiler's got a little mini window somewhere on the main screen, I'll go and find it. I have a few projects running around with me at the moment, none of them especially large - the smallest is around 30,000 lines of code, while the largest is about 140,000. I've been trying to work out how large these projects are, and the only way I've got of doing that is to make a copy of them. I've used this particular method before, and it's okay as far as it goes - but I was curious how much more the method works with references, variables, classes and methods. How much can one project reference in the way that I can theoretically copy the whole thing, and have a working set of files? I'm not expecting this method to work perfectly for every project, but it should do the job with most of them. So, here are the results
