It has provided services like maps, email, instant messaging and more. CEO of Google, Larry Page, wants Google to take its smart phone offering to the next level. "We need to be both a core device and a lifestyle device. And we need to be open," Page said during an appearance at TechCrunch's Disrupt conference. Smartphones generally have access to Wi-Fi, cellular networks and GPS, but Page and other top Google execs understand that more needs to be added to the feature set. They're working to build a "core-as-a-service," according to Satya Nadella, who leads the company's cloud business. Page said that the company is "scaling out" its Android operating system, so that it can be available on both feature phones as well as smart ones. "We want to make sure that we're developing the system in a way that is not just compatible with smartphones, but that the application can run on the devices that we ship today," he said. Google has also expanded its Motorola Mobility acquisition, which includes a patent portfolio. The company has hired a new chief patent counsel, Barbara Kidston, to "work with our patent team to increase its strength and effectiveness." While Google isn't looking to take on Apple in the smart phone market, it's adding security, memory and a few other options to round out its services and make Android a more robust experience. The smart phone market has become extremely competitive and Google has to do what it can to make it a better experience.
