Typically, chemical reactions are used to carry out these transformations and permit the construction of the chemical structure of the subject materials by which the organic materials are modified. In many cases it is more desirable to use an enzyme as the catalyst for the organic transformation, as enzymes are generally highly specific as compared to chemical catalysts and are not readily inactivated by side-reactions. Because enzymes are not generally readily deactivated and are selective catalysts as compared to chemical catalysts, it is preferred that they be removed from an enzyme reaction mixture before the reaction completes. For example, in the carbohydrate transformation of an oligosaccharide to a dextrose-containing compound, the enzymes used as catalysts are usually deactivated
