I was just trying to find info on how a novice user could fix this issue, and while I found some important details, I'm not sure of the best way to solve it. Apparently, the ATA or SATA firmware has information about any hardware issues, but I don't know of a way to extract that information from the OS. Most of the docs/websites/etc I found only go into detail on extracting that information. I could see this being useful in the future for a LAN with all identical motherboards, or going forward with a server cluster. A: Ok, so maybe I didn't explain this as well as I thought. The reason these drives were showing as a disconnected drive was they were all connected to a single motherboard and that motherboard had an issue. So what I did was I attached a SATA cable from a other motherboard to the drives, which I had a SATA controller on, and the drives connected to that motherboard where able to be detected fine. The fact that I have another motherboard with the SATA controller on it was the reason I never thought of it before! Now how to explain it. When a motherboard detects the drive, it asks it's software to "connect" to that drive. It doesn't actually do anything at this point, it just passes the information to the software so the software can tell it what the drive
