Nimbus is a new kind of game for all players. All you need is your logical mind and your curiosity of nature to play Nimbus, and then you won't be disappointed! In this game called Open Space, you will explore and discover a mysterious world on an interstellar space-ship. You are the first explorer of this new system, and your only goal is to safely reach the next star, and maybe even beyond. Open Space is a cinematic game: exploration, experience and discovery play a major role. But do not worry, the game is not a point & click type adventure, but a story driven experience. The controls are simple and natural: double click to move and use, press shift to jump, and the camera is automatically in the place you click. The camera can only move forward. You may need to use the inventory at some points, and the more you play, the more you will be able to use it with a larger number of different items. This game will take you around three years of development. To be completed, it will be distributed on Steam, and all the funding for this game will go to the development of the second game in this series called Orbus. Welcome to this new journey of exploration and discovery! For more information on the Orbus series: A new chapter of the Neon Frontier is about to start. I (M.A.Z.S.) will announce my next project soon, and this time it will be a full game to be distributed on Steam. If you wish to give your opinion on the game, I'll be sharing it on Twitter & Twitch from now on. If you wish to be the first to know, follow me on Twitter or Facebook. If you don't know my history, here is a little introduction: I started as a game developer in 2014. The first game of mine was called Artistic Cosmoramas and it was a pixel art space shooter inspired by Elite. It was developed in about 5 months and published on Steam in June 2014. I was lucky to have the chance to meet Dotate, the artist behind Cenetropolis & Evennia, at this time, he was working on Maxi, a game inspired by Elite. He accepted to give me some advices on making art and I followed them for all my following projects. In this title called IceCream Runner, you must hurry up d41b202975 the 8501 serial protocol not working, so I said, “Fuck it.” Early gateway configuration and placement of ECH. Protocol for stills mode of QL. Protocol for NOHAU. No way of connecting to QL yet. I do a lot of AVR programming at work and I’m starting to discover that hacking a lot of stuff about C can be pretty useful, particularly when not being forced to do it for a living. Also, it’s nice when you work with something that was intentionally built to rip your ass off, but is also quite user-friendly. The St. Louis public school district’s computer science camps have been rather lacking in the last few years. There has been some Macintosh programming, and most of the programming has been done using Microsoft C++, full of warnings about this and that. I decided to go back to that to improve my C, and I found I didn’t know a lot about the warnings. Apparently, there’s an article here, but only in French, and it’s one of those titles that sounds educational, but if your French is a bit rusty, could be a little tricky to understand. So I’m here to offer a quick English translation: In 2001, there were still a lot of courses for kids doing Windows programming. Unfortunately, it was thought (by people who have never programmed a computer) that “CS” would involve programming in C++, and you can get a bad reputation for your programming skills by using C, so kids weren’t exposed to it. 2002 introduced ethernet, and this opened a big wave of networking languages that were easier for beginners. Karel Bossart’s KNET, for example, is a nice simple GUI programming language (like a cross between HyperCard and JAVA) that uses C, which makes it easy to use for a beginner. In 2006, there were two camps, one C only and one C++ only. And finally, the kids are exposed to both, in a relaxed environment where they can teach each other what they know (and because it’s their first experience, they have too much
