Enjoy!Q: Dot-Product Mathematical Properties I am reading this, from Eric Weisstein ( "To form the dot product of two vectors, one must first project the two vectors onto a common orthogonal axis by linear addition. The angle between the two projected vectors is found by computing the absolute value of the dot product of the two vectors divided by the product of their magnitudes. " I cant get what the author means to say here, since by using the Pythagorean Theorem, I can say that when the vectors are parallel, the dot product is 0, and when they are perpendicular, then the dot product is 1. I guess the author wants to say that when two vectors are parallel, when they are perpendicular, the dot product
