The concept of a cognitive affective domain is developed as a framework within which to consider the nature and physiological function of the affective mind. The occurrence of the affective mind is related to visceral processes. Its function is to generate and regulate emotional responses. The main focus is on the negative affective aspect of visceral physiology, and on the effects of negative emotions on emotion-related functioning. Illustrations are drawn from human and animal literature as well as from the fields of psychopharmacology and somatic psychology. The contribution of central and peripheral (i.e. autonomic) nervous system activation to affective processing is discussed. current_line = 0 current_column = 0 current_fn = None self.source_lines = [] self.source_mapping = {} self.source_id
