Note that the article is sponsored by Adobe, but for the sake of objectivity, I do not associate myself with any particular company. On the other hand, GIMP is a new player in the GNU world and is generally considered a free and open source alternative to Photoshop. It uses a graphics package (like Microsoft Visio) for creating diagrams. GIMP is also free but not open source. It uses a layer-based approach like Photoshop, but without a user interface like Photoshop. With Photoshop, you can start simple by doing a few edits and then add many more layers to enhance your work. For example, you can apply effects to photo layers to give the photo a new look without actually changing anything in the image, whereas GIMP uses layers for all of its edits. If you need a fully featured photo editing software, Photoshop may be the tool for you. If you're interested in a quick and simple photo editor, consider GIMP. I'll discuss both of these tools in the rest of this chapter. Getting acquainted with Photoshop This section presents a brief tour of Photoshop, starting with the basic tools available and then working through some advanced editing techniques. Check out Figure 1-1 for a comparison of the two programs side by side. Note that GIMP uses the same tools as Photoshop; they're just arranged differently. Figure 1-1: GIMP and Photoshop side by side. Photoshop's toolbars The top row in Figure 1-1 provides the most basic tools for working with Photoshop. The most important tools are buttons on the left side of the window. The first button, the Crop tool, is a rectangle tool that enables you to draw a rectangle around a part of your image and then crop the area inside of that rectangle. (Unfortunately, in the tutorial in this book, you're not allowed to change the size or shape of the crop box so you can't create an exact crop, but you can still use this tool to get an approximate crop.) The other buttons provide various options in the menu that appear when you click and hold the Crop tool button. The right-click menu for the crop button provides some of the most important options for working in the Crop tool. The right-click menu includes the following options: Fit To Layers: Moves the selected crop area to a specific layer. Crop Selection: Saves the crop box

I'm not sure anyone could argue that "beast mode" is to be avoided, but there are times when simply letting go of extra weight is the best defense we have. Most traditional taekwondo forms, including kyuk, focus on building up our wushu - our body control and balance. While adding more control and agility isn't an unreasonable goal for some, our wushu should be front and center in learning more taekwondo skills - the techniques of taekwondo should help us become more wushu-centered and connected to our body. However, our wushu should always be there to support our taekwondo abilities, not the other way around. Where do we learn all of our "beast mode" skills? When we train wushu, the "beast mode" skills of sticking to our partners' kicks and making them pay for their transgressions become second nature. This training is designed to get us ready for fighting, and when we are in a real fight, when a kick lands squarely on our shins, should we be surprised by how often we react? This is true "beast mode" training. But it can also be that we are training something much deeper. In this article, I want to explore what this might be and how we can use this training to get more from our training sessions. What I really want to go through is a simple exercise. We are looking for a description of a situation where you, or one of your students, are participating in training and one of the following scenarios might be occurring: A.) You are preoccupied with conditioning your movements or solely focused on taekwondo ability. B.) You are letting your student get a cheap shot in. C.) Your student is unable to keep up. D.) You are just in a boring environment. By starting with these four scenarios, I want to get you to think about how you can get more out of your training session. If you can understand how you are using these scenarios, you will be able to create new ones, ones that will really be useful for you and your students. Let's start with what I might call D - a boring environment. This is where I am going to focus our attention. When we have a boring environment, it's easy for all of us to

Q: How can I get rid of this endless space below my news feed? On this test site, I am struggling to get rid of this endless space on the right under my feed. I see I must use justify-self: flex-end; but that pushes the other items down. I do need that stretch-x at the bottom, but I need to get the other elements to stick to the bottom. Here is the relevant excerpt from my css: .fb_feed.inset-rec-row { margin: 0; } .fb_feed.fb_list.fb_article { padding-top: 5px; padding-bottom: 5px; margin: 5px 0 0; } .fb_feed.fb_article { height: 200px; } .fb_feed.fb_article_details { display: inline-block; border: none; min-width: 370px; max-width: 350px; width: 100%; padding: 0; margin: 0; vertical-align: top; } .fb_feed.fb_article_details.fb_listing_title a { font-size: 17px; } .fb_feed.fb_article_details.fb_listing_title a: hover { text-decoration: none; } .fb_feed.fb_article_details.fb_listing_image { max-height: 200px; } .fb_feed.fb_article_details.fb_listing_image img { width: 100%; height: auto; } .fb_feed.fb_article_details.fb_listing_title { overflow: hidden; text-overflow: ellipsis; white-space: nowrap; height: 29px; line-height: 29px; float: left;
