Q: Running a data retrieval program in Java I have a requirement where I need to run a program in Java which will take a string and return an integer. I am not sure how to create the class or the interface which needs to be implemented. String s1 = getData(5); and I have to store that data in an integer variable. Here the return type is integer but I have to return float. A: If I understand correctly you need something like public class MyClass { public float getFloat(String string) { // implement logic to get float } public int getInt(String string) { // implement logic to get int } } You can test it just by adding public to the function body. I am trying to figure out how to use dplyr (or any other package) to get the following results: A B C
