It is known that the primary cause of the loss of efficient performance of the catalytic converters used to limit the emission of oxides of nitrogen (NOx) and oxygen (O2) from automobiles and trucks is the presence of particulates which are in the stream of flowing exhaust gas which are ultimately carried through the exhaust system to exhaust pipe exhaust gas output. These particulates adversely effect the reduced efficiency of the converter at first by the accumulation of particulates on the walls of the converter itself which reduces the ability of the substrate of the converter to properly communicate the heat released to the cooling fluid and ultimately reduces the efficiency of the converter. Secondly, the particulates deposit on the catalytic particles of the converter itself and poison the converter and significantly reduce the effectiveness of the converter in converting oxides of nitrogen and oxygen to $N.sub.2$ and $O.sub.2$. Applicant recognizes that much of the pollution problems created by oxygen rich particles in the exhaust gas is also caused by the soot particles generated by the burn off of fuels used in the driving of the automobile engines by which the majority of automobiles are driven. The present invention is intended to prevent or limit particulate and soot emissions from being introduced to the converter of an automobile or truck and without suffering the adverse affect of introducing material to the converter which will poison it to the point of being ineffective so that the converter can be rapidly saturated to the point where the converter can then function at high efficiency at the levels required of modern automobiles and trucks. It is, therefore, one of the objects of this invention to provide a particulate-limiting converter system for the exhaust of automobiles and trucks which does not generate soot particles but which is unaffected by the generation of such particles and in which means are provided which systematically pass the soot particles and particles of other materials generated by the exhaust system, which accumulate in the converter, to the exhaust gas stream and the contents of which pass thence out the exhaust exhaust pipe or other exhaust output by use of a means which is efficacious and simple in construction and operation.ong Province In Qingying County, Shandong Province In Rizhao, Shandong Province In Huimin, Liaoning Province In Laish
