(AP) — State lawmakers deadlocked on a long-term transportation plan Wednesday, making the chamber unable to put any of the competing plans on the November ballot. A bipartisan group of lawmakers spent more than four hours negotiating the outcome. Rhode Island Rep. Dan McKiernan proposed a plan that called for the state to issue long-term loans to replace much of its fleet of public transportation vehicles and pay for projects to support biking and walking, while the House spent the better part of the day trying to offer cuts to the plan. ADVERTISEMENT The Senate had rejected McKiernan’s plan last week. They are attempting to negotiate with the House to come up with something in time for a later vote. Before the day’s negotiations, Senate President M. Teresa Paiva Weed asked the chamber to discuss the issues it has on the November ballot. She did not say when the chamber would vote. The House had previously scheduled a mid-day vote Wednesday on McKiernan’s plan, with the hope that it could make it onto the November ballot. The plan calls for a $400 million loan to replace the state’s fleet of buses, and half that amount to match federal funds for sidewalk and bicycle projects. It also calls for about $70 million more to be spent on transit-related and non-transit projects. The plan’s tax components would be part of the budget, about $30 million this year and another $30 million next year. The plan is the result of intense negotiations, according to the House. Lawmakers had held 16 public hearings. It includes a record $400 million loan program, a new state authority to oversee the region’s transportation needs and $25 million to incentivize transit development. The plan also calls for a hiring freeze at state transit agencies, the ability to drop
