A man saved a bank robbery suspect's life and caught him in the act after a desperate attempt to flee through the chilly water, police in France said Wednesday. The unidentified 31-year-old was driving to work at the BNP Paribas bank in east Paris when a black Citroen C3 stopped. A second man hopped out, wearing a balaclava, and asked to make a cash withdrawal. The employee told the suspect he didn't have enough cash on him and offered to make an electronic transfer to avoid any problems. The suspect ran away but the frightened employee followed him down the street, following the suspect on foot and eventually catching up with him in the Bois de Vincennes park. The employee then locked onto the suspect's keys and gained entry to the Citroen to try to stop him from fleeing. Caught in the act Bystanders called the police and moments later several officers entered the park and approached the man who was still inside the vehicle. The man, who police said was unarmed, escaped but was caught by one of the officers who had jumped into the water. The driver was handcuffed and taken to hospital after he was found to be suffering from hypothermia and hypoglycemia. The suspect was detained in hospital for nine hours for what were described as "health" reasons before being released. Police released a photo of the suspect's door on Wednesday evening and appealed for information. "The police had a very important witness, who was to be presented with an award on Thursday for having alerted the citizens and caught d0c515b9f4
