Consider this example. I'd like to display the elements inside of an overflow: hidden element. I do this by setting the display property on the container to "none", as I want the container to overlay the elements, but also want it to be hidden. It works perfectly, except that my zooming and panning are broken. The problem is that my container is now invisible, but the elements within it are overflowing outside of the viewport. Obviously, I can solve this by setting overflow: visible for the elements that are actually visible in the viewport. However, since my container is now hidden, I can't zoom, and panning also seems to be broken. I could solve this by setting overflow: visible for both the container and the elements, but it seems like I'm doing a big dance to avoid something that's probably not a big deal. Is there a better way to do this? A: Remove the overflow from the container. #container { overflow: hidden; width: 200px; height: 200px; } This is in the container This is in the container This is in the container If you want the content to be visible outside of the container, then set overflow
