A Container Cartography System (CCS) or container cartographer is a computer software tool (cartography system) that automatically generates spatial information for containers in industry. It was invented by Antal Sándor, Hans Scholz, and their team at the University of Konstanz. They coined the term "container cartography system" in 2006 as a global, universal, industrial system for the entire container industry. Introduction and definition Container Cartography System (CCS) software is an essential information tool for the container industry: the tool, a platform independent software and its CartoBlox as a geospatial, extensible and semantic structure for spatial information. Supported by other CCS-software applications of various industries, fully automatic container traffic information is given to produce an effective and up-to-date system for container terminal logistics. The platform is a component platform that covers the entire product range of the system: At the uppermost level of the system, Container Cartography Systems provide private data for active logistics partners in the container terminal logistics industry. Additionally, CCS has the ability to generate mapping applications based on CartoBoxes. CCS is a general-purpose software that supports different industries with a container terminal logistic product. With CartoBlox data structures, it is both the data base and underlying spatial structure to store and process cartographical data. The components comprise the actual hardware as well as a user-friendly software platform. CartoBlox data structures enable a firm to define spatial queries and data sets, to create maps and overlays and to process automatic data transformation. The cartographic reports and applications offer customers detailed information with the shortest response times. Beside the support of automated customer services, it also offers the possibility of customized product management, including automatic orders and interactive product presentation and navigation.
