Unraveling infectious and host response to systemic Candida albicans infections by non-invasive imaging. The effect of leukocytosis, thrombocytopenia and neutropenia on Candida albicans infection and host response was studied in a murine model by means of non-invasive bioluminescence imaging. Leukocytosis and thrombocytopenia enhanced fungal growth and dissemination. Renal dissemination of C. albicans and dissemination to the kidneys, brain and spleen were increased in thrombocytopenic mice. Although there was no significant difference in survival rates for non-leukocytic, leukocytic and thrombocytopenic, neutropenic mice, bioluminescence imaging was found to be a more reliable tool than blood cultures to assess fungal growth and dissemination. In conclusion, neutropenia and thrombocytopenia are the most important and significant risk factors in developing disseminated infection, as disseminated candidiasis is more severe than uncomplicated systemic candidiasis. Bioluminescence imaging was found to be useful in detecting and assessing C. albicans dissemination, as well as the host response following infection.

1. Field of the Invention The invention relates to a method and a device for monitoring data transfer between a data transmitting device and a data receiving device. 2. Discussion of the Related Art Many electronic systems or devices need to communicate with each other for the exchange of data. A data receiver may receive data from another device and process the received data to generate output data. To be able to establish a reliable communication, the receiver is regularly supplied by data via a data bus. A data bus may for example have several data lines which transfer data according to a data transfer protocol, which may be the industry standard I2C for example. Thus, in the following, the term data transfer also covers a transfer of data according to a data transfer protocol.
