This paper reports the results of investigations into the structure of the nucleolus in living Xenopus embryos. The study was initiated by the discovery that, in addition to its importance in ribosome biogenesis, the nucleolus has a second role in early embryogenesis as a site of gastrulation. In Xenopus, this role takes place during stages IV and V and is characterized by the formation of the protrusions or "poles". We found that the nucleolus organizer is heterogeneous, and that its distribution is established early in embryogenesis. In embryos expressing sea urchin beta-globin RNA, we found that the nucleolus is a relatively small and rounded organ in the centre of the nucleus. The nucleolus is transformed during gastrulation into a considerably larger structure. This structure can be seen as a well-defined area of increased brightness and a distinct black chromatin belt surrounds the periphery. During further embryogenesis, the chromatin around the nucleolus organizer undergoes a major reorganization. In this area, new loci are established which probably represent small nucleoli. From the results of our investigations it is concluded that the nucleolus organizer is heterogeneous, and that its structure is reorganized during Xenopus embryogenesis.Nuclear matrix proteins in mouse neural progenitor cells. Nuclear matrix proteins (NMP) are concentrated in the nuclear matrix and appear to be intimately associated with chromatin. NMP may provide a signal to recruit transcriptional initiation complexes to the promoter and, moreover, increase gene activity. We have studied NMP in mouse neural progenitor cells using subcellular fractionation and fluorescence microscopy of nuclear matrix proteins. In addition to being in the 1cdb36666d
