I'm building my first dungeon, which I am mostly doing by hand (yeah, I know...), and I was wondering, what is the best way to make this hallway? I set it up so that there is a corridor with two rooms on either side, and I was planning to make the rest of the room as a carriage. The idea was that I would make the walls and floor of the carriage on the opposite wall from the corridor, and then put in enough steps so that the carriage could pass between the room (in this case, one room has a ramp for a side passage, and the other has a double set of stairs). I wasn't sure if I should make it flat (with stairs) or not, but am currently leaning toward having a flat surface of the carriage (unless someone can point me to an example). Basically, the question is, how would I keep the carriage from being accessible? For those interested, I'm using a level editor from OpenRPG, which is great, but there are some limitations that are making the carriage a little awkward. A: Two simple methods. One more complex. First way: Make sure the carriage is not normally accessible via an entrance hall or stairway. It isn't normally a level element so there isn't much a programer can do to make sure it isn't there. The second way: Make sure that there is no publicly accessible corridor that links the hallway with the carriage. This probably requires a static position, blocking platforms, or a magic

Some sources say that there is a 1-1 mapping between a piece of cipher text and a PRNG algorithm. However, it seems that that is somewhat idealistic. An example of this is in the paper which says, "there exists a 1-1 mapping between the output of any PRNG algorithm and a certain context-free language." They are obviously referring to context-free grammars. The claim of "1-1" is questionable because you have a context-free grammar of the cipher text, and then you need to specify a PRNG algorithm which corresponds to the grammar. It seems that you should be saying that there is a 1-1 mapping between a context-free grammar and a PRNG algorithm, and then the PRNG can be implemented using the grammar. The claim of "there exists a 1-1 mapping between the output of any PRNG algorithm and a certain language" is a little more believable. In this case, you have a PRNG algorithm and then a context-free grammar which contains the language. Which of these interpretations are correct? A: Which of these interpretations are correct? This question is not for math.stackexchange, though I'm sure you'll get a lot of opinions about it. The answer is that cryptography involves a lot of unpleasant pitfalls when it comes to mathematics. Cryptography math (the sort of thing that really matters) is a lot more tricky than most people expect, and most of the math is done by non-mathematicians who don't know about cryptography. The point is that if you're trying to decrypt some ciphertext using some sort of
