Q: Are many different variations possible with a two-string guitar? I've played guitar for about 5 years and I was looking around my attic, and I found a nice plastic octave guitar that had a nice bright green finish and a nice shiny chrome finish. After a little research, I found out that it's a plastic guitar, and I know that there is a difference in sounds between a plastic and a wooden guitar. My question is are there different sounds and changes that can be made on a plastic guitar to get a totally different sound? A: As long as you're doing the right thing for the shape of your body, I think the answer to your question is yes, there are different sounds that can be created by using different guitars of various shapes. The sound from a neck depends on the string spacing and the position of the strings in relation to the fretboard: these are the two obvious parameters to adjust. The other obvious parameter is the pick-ups and the electronics, which can create various sounds from the string vibrations. All those can give different notes, which will have different timbre and tonality. But to answer the question: Yes, the reason you have variations in the sounds is because different guitars have different qualities in the wood they're made from. And you can create sounds with other styles of guitar, like fretless, but they would have different body shapes, which will change the timbre. A: You can play good sounds with one string on a plastic guitar. What you can't do is find sounds with a guitar and a capo. Capos give you the ability to switch between one string and various positions of the strings in relation to the fretboard. Sounds can be made with one string on a capo for similar reasons as using one string on a plastic guitar. Playing chords on a plastic guitar can be tricky at best. You'll need a flat-pick and an alternative set of pick-ups on your guitar to get a different sound. If you want a clean, twangy sound you'll need a tube, and an overdrive effect box will change the tone considerably. I would recommend looking at different shapes. The width of the neck is usually the widest area of the body of a guitar, where it narrows for the fretboard. How you shape the body will have a lot of influence on
