Nicotinic acid: effects on cholesterol metabolism in the rat. A study on the cholesterol-lowering effect of niacin in the rat was carried out. It was found that low doses of niacin administered for a period of 3 weeks caused an increase in the amount of high density lipoprotein (HDL) and apolipoprotein A-I in the serum while the total serum cholesterol and low density lipoprotein (LDL) concentration decreased. The ratio of HDL cholesterol/LDL cholesterol in the serum increased significantly. Niacin's dose effect on cholesterol metabolism was also investigated and in these experiments a maximal effect on serum cholesterol occurred at a dose of 20 mg/kg. Plasma free fatty acids, triglycerides and phospholipids decreased significantly while cholesterol and cholesterol esters increased after niacin administration. The results of these studies have demonstrated that niacin has a definite impact on the metabolism of cholesterol in the rat and that its effects on plasma lipids are, at least in part, due to changes in the lipid components of lipoproteins.

Wireless handheld communication devices have become common in modern society. These handheld devices, such as cellular telephones and user equipment (UE), communicate with other devices using wireless transmission paths. The handheld devices may communicate with remote servers and other handheld devices using voice, data, and/or other communication technologies. In some wireless communications systems, a single base station may serve as a source of wireless coverage for many remote devices. The wireless communication devices may communicate with the base station, as well as each other over a shared radio air interface. The shared air interface may be implemented using one or more frequency bands of the radio spectrum. As such, the air interface may use time division duplexing (TDD) or frequency division duplexing (FDD) to assign one or more frequency bands of the radio spectrum to each communication channel. In TDD, a single frequency band of the air interface is used and the frequency band is reused periodically over the time. In FDD, different frequency bands of the air interface are used over the time. Both TDD and FDD may require sophisticated antenna designs to reduce interference between communication channels sharing the radio spectrum.

I come across questions where the asker left a lot of tags and info on the question in addition to the data that should be actual information for the question. As far as I know, there shouldn't be info in addition to the data that should be actual information for the question. This makes reading the question difficult. I am not saying that all of these info is bad. But I'm mostly asking if there is consensus on what kind of info is bad? A: What's posted on the main page is the minimum that will be allowed, so if you're posting here then you can see that this answer is effectively an extended discussion of the main answer, and also why it would be useful to have that set of tags. There are multiple questions here about what data is appropriate, and the consensus is that it is often a judgement call. For example, this question is a good example of a duplicate that is tagged with all relevant information. This means it doesn't need to be cleaned up with data from other questions. In the case of this question, the question hasn't been cleaned up properly and should be flagged for moderator attention. This other question has been edited with irrelevant data. I think it's probably ok because I don't think the OP knows that this is bad 0cc13bf012

Now when I run this script on a machine with 32G RAM, it takes ~10 min to complete (I have set the gc.collect() in each loop to a large number, so the garbage collection should not slow down things). Now I want to test this script and I want it to take the same time as if I run it in a machine with 32G RAM. I can run my script in a VM with 32G RAM, but I am not sure if the VM will adjust its memory for the python process. And if I do run my script inside a 32G RAM VM, will I get the same memory allocation as 32G RAM machine? A: For the GC to take the same time as on a 32GB machine, you should set the heap size to more than twice the size of the memory you have on the system where you are running your script. This should "tune" the GC for your use case. Q: ScrollView not responsive to a gesture I want to make the ScrollView respond to a user gesture with the IsHorizontalScrollEnabled property set to false. This property is a real nuisance to me as I do not understand why it is not working. I want to implement an infinite horizontal scroll. The scroll in the snippet of code below works fine without the setting of the IsHorizontalScrollEnabled property, but as soon as I try to set it, the scroll is stopped.
