Moyamoya disease is characterized by cerebrovascular occlusive lesions at the cerebral base. It is considered that the cause of moyamoya disease may be abnormal cerebrovascular development. In order to obtain clinical information for making a treatment plan, cerebral hemodynamics and the vascular pathological findings of the disease are thought to be important. We measured the blood flow around the basal ganglia using single photon emission computed tomography. Ten patients with moyamoya disease were studied before and immediately after the revascularization surgery. We used 99mTc-hexamethylpropyleneamine oxime to image the blood flow around the basal ganglia. In five patients with cortical blindness, the blood flow was significantly increased around the basal ganglia after surgery. But in the other five patients without cortical blindness, it was not significantly increased after surgery. The cortical blood flow was increased in patients with functional cortex compared with patients with infarction. In an in vivo perfusion study, we found that blood flow was increased in the cortex around the basal ganglia in patients with cortical blindness after revascularization surgery. We conclude that increased blood flow in the cortex around the basal ganglia plays an important role in the recovery of visual function in moyamoya disease.Crowns (or cap-like crowns) are generally formed by a very thin layer of enamel that is used to cover the teeth (see FIG. 1).
