Self-reactive immunoglobulins in cancer patients. Increased serum levels of IgG were detected in 50% of patients with acute leukaemia. This was a very interesting observation since several investigators in the past have studied the role of autoantibodies in malignant diseases. Furthermore, it was found that the increase of IgG correlated with the disease stage. The IgG content of sera of cancer patients was analyzed by agarose gel electrophoresis. Precipitates of sera of 13% of acute leukaemia patients reacting with an antiserum of homogeneous affinity were detected. Analysis of precipitates by means of two-dimensional electrophoresis revealed the presence of a tumour-specific protein or in the case of a leukaemic patient two distinct proteins. The presence of tumour-specific antibody was also studied in breast, gastric and colorectal carcinoma patients using the antigens isolated from homogeneous tumour cell cultures as antigens. The obtained results support the possible existence of tumour-specific immunoglobulins which might be useful in the classification of patients with malignant diseases.
