Hubble Sees A Massive Explosion While Searching The Universe The Hubble Space Telescope has come across what's arguably the most spectacular image of a star ever taken. The image is of a star called Eta Carinae, located 4,500 light years away in the Carina nebula, and it's showing us a massive explosion. According to scientists, this is a core-collapse supernova, in which a dying star ejects its outer layers and explodes. Astronomers believe that they've never seen a star so big explode this violently before, with the most powerful eruptions in recorded history, causing a spectacular explosion that released more energy than the Sun produces in a billion years. The image consists of infrared, visible light, and ultraviolet light and shows us massive hot gas being blasted out into space. This is what caused the explosion, which is such a departure from the star that it broke a gas cloud which lies in front of the star. In this image, we can see the eruption, which is so violent that it's melted gas that has been ejected into the surrounding area. According to NASA, there are about 170 million stars in the Milky Way, but there are only about 1000 massive stars which end up causing supernova eruptions. About 100 out of the 1000 stars that are massive enough cause their core to collapse, resulting in a supernova explosion. A supernova explosion is the largest and most powerful explosion we can see in the universe. The late-stage supernova begins with the ejection of the outer layers of the star, which releases shock waves and radiation. The star that we're looking at is so big that it produced a "shock wave 100 light years into space." The star is being torn apart and the stardust is being flung out into space by the gravitational forces. Eta Carinae is one of the fastest stars in the galaxy and is even 2,000 times more massive than our Sun. However, instead of flying into a black hole, scientists found it had a very high velocity, meaning it was going at about 100,000 miles an hour. These types of explosions typically give off light for 10-100 years. However, Eta Carinae is one of the youngest stars ever discovered and it will continue releasing massive amounts of energy as it continues to grow. It was meant to be a school trip to Disney World, but that now famous hot air balloon ride goes
