The function of high power lasers is well established for a variety of applications such as welding and cutting metal. Other applications for laser beams include cleaning and treating metals, glass, concrete, paint, and textiles, and for drilling, milling, or cleaning hard surfaces. Harsh physical conditions, such as high and/or corrosive temperatures and pressures, have made laser beam applications unsuitable for industrial use in many environments. Commercial laser beam systems have been custom built for specific applications, and major down-time for maintenance is usually required. Laser beam systems may be used to generate and deliver highly focused pulses of coherent light to specific locations for cutting, drilling, welding or melting various types of materials. A laser beam system may include a laser source that generates a high-power pulsed laser beam. To control the focusing characteristics and beam diameter, a scanning system with an associated optical system is often used. Laser scanners include galvanometer-driven rotating mirrors, acoustooptic Bragg cell deflectors, resonant nonlinear multilayer mirrors, holographic grating, and holographic phase masks. In a galvanometer driven scanning system, the mirror rotates to direct a light beam along a scanning path. A galvanometer is an electro-mechanical device that controls the angular position of a mirror by application of a voltage to an electrode which is mounted on the mirror. For proper scanning it is important for the mirror to be vibrated at the proper resonant frequency of the mirror. The galvanometer driven mirror oscillates at a single resonant frequency. Any adjustment of the resonant frequency will cause the galvanometer system to lose step-stability. In a holographic scanning system, the mirror is rotated by a vibrating acousto-optic modulator. This is a solid-state component that transmits RF energy into a crystal. The crystal is caused to vibrate, typically at or near its resonant frequency by the
