wrong. If you "crack" a.nib file in macOS, you will get a self-contained binary containing the nib file. In your example, this might seem like a cracked version, but it is not: all you gained is that you can use the self-contained binary if you want, but this does not affect its functionality at all. If you want to know how a self-contained.nib file is packed, start with the Resources directory. It is really simple. You just need to check the files in the Contents.xml (all files ending with.a) directory. For example, starting with the
